

Assembling Folding Space-Station Interior "M"

The Security Desk

If you're trying to infiltrate a space station, you HAVE to have a security desk to make things difficult. Or if you're trying to catch some infiltrators, the security desk will be your nerve center. Hidden video cameras can view most of the key places in the station, and the controls can lock doors, turn off transporters, and cause all kinds of other mischief. Nearby, a double transporter lets two security guards zap off to two separate locations at once. This interior also includes a battery back-up system, for emergency power to the station if the main reactor fails.

Print one copy of each page. Assemble the walls and floor just like the other space-station interiors. The two five-panel walls are interchangeable; make sure the six-panel wall goes where its blank panel lines up with the blank floor spaces for the battery system. One long and one short gray control panel go in the large security room. Glue the orange-themed control panel between the transporter grids. The battery back-up system gets glued to the wall and floor spots marked out for it. It all looks like this when done:

+   +   #
-|+--|+#
@|  E|  #
s|    |  #
@| EE|  #    "+" are doors
-|+--|+#    "@" are transporter grids
|  [|  #    "s" are small control panels for transporters
|  [|  #    "E" are security panels
#-+|-+|-|+#    "[" are a battery back-up system

For outer walls, use walls from any of the other interiors, preferably walls with not too many doors.
